Child custody attorneys in New Jersey continue to see an increasing number of away custody cases that devolve into allegations of child abduction and other serious legal complications. Nothing is more terrifying than child abduction and the fact that the other parent is responsible is often of little comfort.

Enforcing Child Custody Orders. Every case of child abduction or kidnapping by a parent is also likely a violation of a custody order. Because of that, many of the remedies in a child abduction case are the same as those available for any violation of a child custody order. Some of the penalties for violating custody orders are large fines, jail time, loss of custody, or loss of visitation rights. The children of parents waging a custody battle, or those arguing about visitation are most at risk of parental kidnapping, which happens when a parent kidnaps and conceals a child for any length of time. It is a serious crime. Moreover, parental abduction is child abuse because it abruptly severs the relationship between a child and parent. Parental child abductions are the most widespread form of child's abduction. Cases of parental child abduction generally happen during a divorce process or after a divorce action has been taken. The intention is frequently to get around the court or act in contempt of a court order against the legal custody of the child.
