On the same coin of the realm as behavioral medicine but on the flip side is the field of behavioral health, which encompasses health promotion, education, and prevention (e.g., accident prevention, immunization, nutrition, physical fitness and exercise, occupational safety and health, and changing health-damaging lifestyles.).

The biopsychosocial approach to professional psychology emphasizes meeting the behavioral health needs and promoting the biopsychosocial functioning of the general public. In contrast to this, the BPS model potentially justifies a morass of anything goes in medicine and health. S. Nassir Ghaemi has offered one of the most systematic critiques of the BPS model.
